

Continuing centralization of American media, including cross-ownership, is dangerous. It weakens democratic institutions by limiting opportunities for informing ourselves responsibly from various sources. It reduces the number of active reporters and solidifies determination by the few of the style and content of our news.